Crack ExpertThe document is dated "AD 1030" – which means 1030 years ago – and it has the seal of King Edward the Confessor and the two English kings that would follow him. Edward I inherited his kingdom from his father-in-law and by then he was a powerful ruler and very well respected as King of England and Lord of Ireland. The Assize of Clarendon, which was composed in the early 12th century, appears to be an accurate reflection of the politics and law of England. Its aims and purpose were to reorganise and strengthen the rule of law by enforcing uniformity and consistency of judgement in the system of trial by jury. It also sets out the relevant laws and customs. As it says in its opening paragraph: "There is no one point so important as this – the due proceedings of trials by jury." The Assize is focused primarily on the law relating to the jury system and to trial by jury as it was administered in the counties of England, Wales and Ireland. It also touches on the law relating to the knight's fee and the law of lordships and how it affected how land should be leased. It is also interesting to note the role of lawyers in the formation of the Assize. Lawyers are mentioned 16 times in the opening pages of the Assize. Although it seems to have been a fairly straightforward document for a lawyer to read, the Assize, in its length, is also quite an interesting work for modern students of law. Richard Lyons, in his book: The English Assize of Clarendon, said: "[It is] a document of some 82157476af
